

Reclaimed railway sleepers and wagon planks are durable and have an abundance of rustic charm from decades of use. To retain the authenticity of this timber, we have left it in its natural state, showing the story of where the planks have been.

The railway sleepers are thinner than the average railway sleeper, making them more versatile. They have not been coated in toxic creosote and therefore are safe to use for building furniture. The wagon planks were used form the outer walls of the train wagons, with visible bolt holes and dark dye around the holes, making them very distinctive.

Here are some ideas of how best to use railway sleepers and wagon planks to build a wide range of items for your home and garden.

Indoor uses for railway sleepers and wagon planks

They can be used to construct authentic wooden flooring and doors, framing pictures or artwork and creating indoor roofing with genuine aged patina.

You can create an interior feature of wooden panelled walls or use them as decorative sleepers around the home, for items such as mantelpieces, fireplace surrounds, headboards and stair treads.

Outdoor uses for railway sleepers and wagon planks

Garden sleepers can be made into sturdy edging on raised garden beds for vegetables, herbs, or flowers. Lay them flat to form garden paths and walkways, or on their sides to define the paths. You can build large planters, construct decking and patio areas, or build a firewood storage rack with them.
